APA Quick Guide

Publication Manual of the American Psychological Association
6th edition, 2nd printing

APA formatting gives credit to the authors whose information you use in your writing. To avoid plagiarism, you must use the most important parts of APA formatting: in-text citations and references. Each in-text citation must correspond to a reference citation in your references list.

In-text Citation

In your essay when you mention an author’s ideas, write their name and the year they published the information before the punctuation for the end of the sentence. If you are using an author’s exact words, put the words in quotation marks and include an in-text citation with the author’s name, publication year, and page number.

Examples:

In-text citation for paraphrase or summary:
(Smith, 2014).

In-text citation for quote:
(Smith, 2014, p. 5).

Reference

At the end of your essay, write the author, publication year, title, and publication location for every author you cited. References are formatted based on where you found your information. For example, a reference for a website will look different from a reference for a textbook. For a full list of the different types of references and video tutorials visit http://bethelu.libguides.com/apa. Also, your librarian is glad to help you apply APA formatting.

Examples:

Reference for a website:

Reference for an online textbook by one author (like VCamp’s Read):

Reference for an online video lecture (like VCamp’s Attend):
Bethel University. (2014). Orientation to online learning [Video]. Retrieved from https://www.betheluniversityonline.net/

Reference for a library database article or book:
Library databases give you the references for their articles and books. In EBSCO, if you are looking at the article you will see a Cite button on the right.
A direct quote is using someone else’s exact words. You must put those words in quotation marks and include an in-text citation with page numbers. For example: “The library is cool” (Bethel University, 2014, p. 1). Paraphrasing is using your own words to describe an author’s ideas, but you must give credit to your source. For example: Students should take notes from sources, not directly quote the source, to minimize the amount of quoted material in an essay (Lester, 1976).